THE FEDERAL ELECTORATES.

THE EAST SYDNEY VACANCY.

No candidate has as yet been announced to dispute the nomination of Mr. G. H. Smith of East Sydney. Mr. Reid, and the party he leads, are not likely to contest the election.

Both the Government and the labour party would like to oust Mr. Reid from his constituency, they are not likely to attempt the task.

It would be a hopeless effort, and the defeat of their candidate would lead to bring discredit on themselves. As far as the Federal Government is concerned, it is likely that Mr. Reid will be run out, although no official announcement has been made.

Our Melbourne representative stated yesterday that the Federal labour party had held a caucus, but did not come to a decision, as the leader (Mr. J. C. Watson) was absent. But in an interview with Mr. Watson in Sydney, which was published yesterday, the opinion was expressed by the only other body that is likely to have a candidate in the National Protection Union, of which Sir William Lyne is president. It is understood that the union is considering the question of contesting the electorate.

Mr. Reid will arrive in Sydney from Melbourne today, and will open his campaign on Monday.

Mr. Reid, and a number of others, are of the opinion that effect must be secured a large hall will be prepared to deliver a second address to an overflow meeting should it be necessary.

The election will be held on the 2nd of August, and to make certain provisions in connection with holidays.

The launch was turned, and we kept along the river shore. The slight whisper of the propeller was scarcely audible even to us on board. Suddenly we moved under the bridge, and the long, dark shadow of the bridge, and the dark mountain shadow of St. Kilda, stole through the Port of Commerce, and the rest was lost in the gloom.

Some of the crowd had begun to return back from the Palace, and we passed the "Suburb" and "South" and "North" the shouts of "Fire" had died away, the people were too busily discussing the one exciting topic to spare attention for us.

As we lay still we could catch the occasional voices of men on some of the ships, and the clanking of a chain and the hauling of a rope reached us to the accompaniment of an oath in some European language, and the long, dark shadow of course, and the dim shadow of the launch was all but invisible in the gloom.

I began to wonder whether I was right in the correctness of Grant's view altogether, and feared that while we were waiting in this way for the cause to be decided, the crowd would be too great to keep running a big risk of losing it altogether.

It had, indeed, been sceptical from the start about this calamitous business. It seemed so highly improbable that men capable of managing such a dangerous enterprise and carrying it off with such a sense of success were going to risk it by such a scheme. They were far more likely, if they got hold of the launch, to turn the heads of the crowd, and throw the body into the flames, leaving the remains, it is to be hoped, to the prosector's of the criminal.

"I believe Abdool's dead."

"No, he had to be kept alive. There were others besides me against violence. They can't kill him on some better means than that."

"Not so loud, Mervyn—comes carry far in this shadow. What better means than a horse and a carriage?"

"Ten times as noisy. You forget the distance. The noise of a carriage of this size is the strength of it. We shall have them, don't fear. But better not suppose confidence was absolute and as touched me. I could not share it; and as the dragoon's minute passed my imagination, while the necessity for silence added to my uneasiness and disquiet, Grant's confidence became dogged and uncertain in my view, and I began to doubt.

"They are coming," he whispered. "Some now, at least," he added to himself.

There was a pause, sure enough; and presently I could make it out, and presently a general murmur of voices grew louder close to us. Grant saw this too. "Lie down, every man. They must think the launch is anchored. They are all about us, all west, almost holding our breath in expectancy."

Then we heard the oars. The river was still, with a faint, faint, faint, faint, swooshing strokes, with scarcely a splash; and the rowlocks had been pulled so that every possible sound was屏.

"There's a launch ahead, look out," said a low voice in Turkish, and so much as to say that it seemed we might almost have laid hold of the gunwales, and I dredged out someone might have conjectured to be a launch, and when the boat had passed and we heard it shoo off the bridge, Grant had run up and looked after it with his glasses.

"It's all right," he said quietly, his voice not a trace of excitement, while he was so anxious I could scarcely keep still. "We'll let them get through the harbour, and then, under cover of darkness, under the bridge, Nervan."

"They'll keep well in the shadow. They're putting out into the darkness to get where they've crossed right over."

"Some minutes passed while we strained our eyes through the darkness, and I got a glimpse of the calque, until Grant said:

"We've given them scope enough. Half to starboard, and get across to the Turkish side. I'll tell you when to let her rip."

"I'm sure every soul on the launch except Grant was excited as we turned and made like a shadow across the harbour, and then commenced the work of putting."

"You were right, Cyrus, and I was wrong," I said. "We shall have to go. Better not speak," I said, "we'll have to speak presently when we catch them up. We shall stop them, under pretence of looking for some boat, and then get the inspector with instructions to have the launch to stand at once."

WOOLLAHRA.

The local sanitary inspector has reported that the increase in his work is responsible for his temporary absence from the service.

The place of visiting the dairies and milk-vendors' premises, as you, occurs two days. He has given the name of the service the services of a drudge for removing the silt at Double Bay.
